Abstract

Femicide has been a persistent phenomenon in Nigeria, which is basically against one of the Sustainable Development Goals. The frequent media reports of femicide tend to generate panic in society. Media reports on femicide play a crucial role in shaping public perception and influencing societal responses. How femicide is portrayed in the media can either reinforce harmful stereotypes or promote awareness and change. Studies indicate that media coverage often lacks depth and sensitivity, sometimes sensationalising the violence rather than addressing the underlying gender-based issues. Against this backdrop, this study investigates the relationship between media reports on the issue of femicide in Nigeria and the audience's awareness and perception. Anchored on Perception theory, the study employed quantitative research, using questionnaires to explore the in-depth analysis of audience awareness and perception of femicide in Nigeria. The population was estimated at 1046 undergraduate students in the institution; while Taro Yamane's formula was used to determine the sample size of 290. Purposive and probability sampling were used to sample the respondents, representing diverse demographics related to the study. The findings of this study indicate that 70% says have come across news which tells about femicide, 57.9% show that there is no platform which the media uses in creating awareness, and 57.9% agreed there is a high level of media coverage of femicide in Nigeria. These indicate that media coverage of femicide in Nigeria varies and may influence the audience's awareness and perceptions of these instances. Also, the media frequently sensationalises stories of femicide, emphasising gory details and blaming victims for their own deaths. The study recommends that Nigerian media outlets should reach out to a variety of audiences, including women, men, youth, and marginalised groups. Interacting with various communities can support the development of a coordinated response to gender-based violence as well as a conversation on the prevention and treatment of femicide.

Introduction

Gender-related killings (femicide/feminicide) are the most brutal and extreme manifestation of violence against women and girls. Defined as an intentional killing with a gender-related motivation, femicide may be driven by stereotyped gender roles, discrimination towards women and girls, unequal power relations between women and men, or harmful social norms. (UNwomen.org, 22nd November 2023). In a study developed by the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime and UN Women and approved by the UN Statistical Commission in March 2022, globally, an estimated 81,100 women and girls were killed intentionally in 2021. The overall number of female homicides remained largely unchanged over the past decade. The study stated, “approximately 56% of all female homicides are committed by intimate partners or other family members”. (UNwomen.org, 22nd November 2023).

Femicide, the gender-based killing of women, is a severe violation of human rights and a critical social issue worldwide. According to Spies (2020), media reporting on femicide plays a crucial role in shaping public perception and influencing societal responses. The way femicide is portrayed in the media can either reinforce harmful stereotypes or promote awareness and change. Studies indicate that media coverage often lacks depth and sensitivity, sometimes sensationalising the violence rather than addressing the underlying gender-based issues (Bello et al., 2020).

Moreover, the audience's perception of femicide reporting is shaped by several factors, including the frequency, tone, and context of the coverage. Sensationalist reporting can lead to desensitisation or voyeuristic consumption of violence, whereas responsible reporting can foster empathy and a deeper understanding of the issue (Schnepf and Christmann, 2023). A study by Rodat (2022) found that comprehensive and contextualised reporting on femicide can enhance public awareness and generate support for policy changes aimed at preventing violence against women. Therefore, it is crucial to examine how different reporting styles influence audience attitudes and behaviours regarding femicide.

In Nigeria, femicide presents a particularly troubling challenge, as reports of such crimes persist, reflecting underlying societal issues and gender-based violence. Femicide is quickly turning into an epidemic in Nigeria as well as in many parts of the world. It poses a significant societal challenge, and understanding how media narratives shape public perceptions is crucial for raising awareness and influencing social change.

In Nigeria, femicide continues to be an issue that is frequently underreported, normalised, or dismissed. In Nigeria, 401 women reportedly died as a result of sexual and gender-based violence (SGBV) in 2022 alone. According to data from the DQHS Femicide Dashboard, there were 135 femicide incidents resulting in 149 deaths in 2024. As of the time of this report, there have been 17 incidents and 19 deaths in 2025 (United Nations, 2025).

The News Media help shape society's perception of social problems as well as public opinion of victims and offenders. However, minimal research has been conducted to examine whether news media frame stories of femicide within the context of domestic violence (femicide). Recent studies that analysed the way in which around sixteen countries covered violence against women between 2000 and 2015 showed that media misrepresented the realities of women's experience of violence perpetrated against them (Pröll & Magin, 2022). Those misrepresentations were often related to the way in which journalists reported about social context, sensationalism, misrepresentations and rape myths, blame and responsibility, and voices of authority and opinion. The situation seems to be similar in the case of femicide (Slakoff, 2023).

It is impossible to discuss the issue of femicide without providing real-life examples of femicide cases.

JUSTINA OTUENE NKANG

Justina, who was a 400-level engineering student at the University of Port Harcourt, was brutally killed by Okoligwe Damian Chinemere, who was said to be her boyfriend, in October 2023. Justina's dead body was found mutilated in her boyfriend's house a few days after she was declared missing. Reports say that the killer was trying to dispose of the corpse wrapped in a polythene bag when he was caught (The Nation, October 26, 2023).

AUGUSTA OSEDION

Augusta, who was an undergraduate student of Lead City University Ibadan, reportedly made a frantic phone call to her mother on the 11th of July 2023 after getting into a heated argument with her boyfriend. During this altercation, Augusta was brutally stabbed to death by her boyfriend, Benjamin Best (Vanguard, July 18, 2023).

UWALIA OMOZUWA

Uwalia, more commonly known as Uwa, was a 100-level student at the University of Benin who was raped by assailants in a parish of the Redeemed Christian Church of God (RCCG) in Edo State on May 27, 2020 (The Guardian, June 2, 2020).

RONKE SHONDE

Ronke, a banker and a mother of 2, was beaten to death by her husband, Lanre Shonde. According to a neighbour who knew the couple, before taking his wife's life, Mr Shonde used to "tie her, beat her, and take her mobile phones away" (Daily Post September 26, 2018).

These are just a few examples out of the thousands of victims of Gender based violence and femicide in Nigeria. When attempting to examine femicide as an issue in Nigerian society, it is important to take notice of the different places in which this crime is perpetrated. These places include The Home (Family), the streets, and even the schools. Public responses to femicide reporting can range from advocacy and support for victims to apathy or even victim-blaming. The media's role in shaping these responses is significant. Positive responses often include increased public discourse on gender-based violence, heightened advocacy for victims, and calls for policy reforms (Rodat, 2022). Conversely, negative responses can perpetuate harmful stereotypes and reinforce victim-blaming narratives. Understanding these dynamics is essential for developing strategies to improve media reporting on femicide and to foster constructive public engagement with the issue.

Statement of the Problem

Femicide remains a pervasive and alarming issue globally, with significant implications for gender equality and human rights. Despite international efforts to address gender-based violence, the rates of femicide have not shown significant decline, as evidenced by the staggering statistic that approximately 81,100 women and girls were intentionally killed in 2021, with over half of these murders committed by intimate partners or family members (UN Women, 2023). In Nigeria, the situation is particularly dire, with femicide cases frequently reported in the media, yet public and institutional responses remain inadequate. According to Ogunlana et al. (2021), rape and femicide incidences in Nigeria during and after the COVID-19 lockdown increased steadily from 5.1% in March to 33.3% in June, with rape being more prevalent in Northern Nigeria. This gap highlights the urgent need to understand the dynamics of media reporting on femicide and its influence on public awareness, perceptions, and responses.

However, Nigerian media is still largely androcentric in its reporting, with a significant burden placed on the victims to prevent the violence that is meted out on them. While Nigerian media seems to have some understanding of the structural and institutional nature of intimate partner femicide and gender violence in general, the reaction to it is less about systemic interventions and more about women accepting the weight of the problem and adjusting their lives around it (La Casa del Encuentro, 2022).

This study aims to fill these gaps by examining the level of awareness undergraduate students have about femicide in Nigeria, evaluating their perceptions of femicide cases, and assessing their responses to such reports. By focusing on a key demographic that represents future leaders and influencers, this research seeks to uncover the intricate relationships between audience perception and societal responses.

The objective of this study is to:

1. examine the level of awareness undergraduate students have of femicide in Nigeria
2. evaluate the undergraduate students' perception of femicide cases in Nigeria
3. investigate the impact of media coverage on awareness and perception of femicide in Nigeria

Media Influence on Public Perception

The media plays a critical role in shaping public awareness and attitudes towards femicide, acting as both a mirror and a moulder of societal values and norms. Through various platforms such as news reports, television programs, and social media, the media can bring attention to the issue of femicide, highlight its prevalence, and underscore the need for societal and policy changes (Bas et al., 2022). Effective media coverage has the potential to increase public understanding of the severity and frequency of gender-based violence, potentially mobilising communities to advocate for the protection of women and girls (Richards et al., 2011).

This involves providing context, highlighting the systemic nature of the problem, and including voices from advocacy groups and experts in gender studies (Martins-Filho, 2018). Responsible media practices can play a crucial role in educating the public about the root causes of femicide, such as entrenched gender inequalities, and the societal norms that perpetuate violence against women. By doing so, the media can contribute to a more informed and engaged public discourse, encouraging both individual and collective actions to combat femicide.

Perception of Femicide

Sensationalist reporting often focuses on graphic details and emotional aspects of the crime to attract viewership, which can lead to a skewed perception of the issue. This approach may sensationalise violence against women and perpetuate harmful stereotypes about victims and perpetrators (Schnepf & Christmann, 2023). In contrast, contextual reporting provides a comprehensive understanding by exploring the underlying causes and societal implications of femicide. Studies suggest that responsible reporting, which contextualises femicide within broader social contexts, can enhance public empathy and support for policies aimed at preventing gender-based violence (Rodat, 2022).

In many patriarchal societies, femicide is sometimes seen as an extension of control and dominance over women. Perpetrators may justify their actions based on traditional beliefs that dictate women's subservience or property status, reinforcing gender inequalities and limiting women's autonomy (Daher-Nashif, 2021). This perception not only trivialises the severity of violence against women but also perpetuates cycles of abuse and impunity. Similarly, cultural norms and beliefs play a crucial role in shaping perceptions of femicide. In some cultures, deeply ingrained beliefs about gender roles and honour can lead to justifications or normalisation of violence against women perceived as disobedient or deviating from societal norms (Meneghel et al., 2017). These cultural perceptions not only hinder efforts to combat femicide but also perpetuate harmful stereotypes and discrimination against women.

Over time, scholars have highlighted femicide as a systemic issue requiring multifaceted approaches that address root causes such as misogyny, economic disparities, and lack of legal protections (Corradi et al., 2016). This scholarly perspective challenges simplistic views and underscores the need for comprehensive strategies to prevent and respond to femicide. Furthermore, survivor perspectives and advocacy efforts are instrumental in shaping perceptions of femicide, highlighting the human impact and demanding systemic changes. Survivors and their families will often advocate for policy reforms, victim support services, and societal education to prevent future violence. Their narratives humanise the issue and challenge societal apathy or tolerance towards gender-based violence.

Responses to Femicide

Audience responses to media reports on femicide encompass a spectrum of emotions and actions, ranging from empathy and outrage to activism and advocacy. Media plays a pivotal role in shaping these responses by bringing visibility to femicide cases and highlighting their impact on victims and society. Globally, femicide is a pressing issue intertwined with gender-based violence and discrimination, prompting diverse responses from governments, NGOs, and communities alike. The responses to femicide can be categorised into legal reforms, grassroots activism, awareness campaigns, international frameworks, and social support systems.

Legal reforms play a crucial role in addressing femicide by ensuring perpetrators are held accountable and victims receive justice. For instance, countries like Argentina have enacted specific laws addressing femicide, such as the Ley 26.485, which defines femicide and mandates stricter penalties for offenders (UN Women, 2016). According to McPherson (2022), more must be done to label femicide cases, especially intimate partner cases, appropriately and improve the current criminal justice framework. Such legal measures aim to deter potential perpetrators and provide a legal framework for prosecuting gender-based violence.

Furthermore, grassroots movements not only advocate for legal reforms but also foster solidarity among victims and survivors, creating networks of support and empowerment. Similarly, awareness campaigns and education initiatives are crucial in changing societal attitudes towards femicide. These campaigns often aim to challenge patriarchal beliefs that justify violence against women and promote gender equality. For example, the "Orange the World" campaign by UN Women raises awareness about violence against women and girls globally, encouraging individuals and communities to take action (UN Women, 2023).

In addition, social support systems are essential in providing safety and rehabilitation for victims of femicide and their families. Services such as crisis hotlines, shelters, and counselling help survivors rebuild their lives and seek justice. Countries like Spain have implemented specialised courts and support services for victims of gender-based violence, offering comprehensive assistance beyond legal prosecution (Cubells & Calsamiglia, 2018). These support systems play a crucial role in breaking the cycle of violence and empowering survivors to reclaim their rights and dignity.

In essence, responses to femicide encompass a range of strategies from legal reforms and grassroots activism to international frameworks and social support systems. Effective responses require a comprehensive approach that addresses both the root causes of gender-based violence and the immediate needs of victims.

Theoretical Framework

Perception Theory

Perception theory posits that individuals' understanding and interpretation of reality are shaped by their experiences, cultural background, and the information they consume. This theory suggests that perception is not a passive reception of sensory data but an active process of constructing meaning from stimuli (Gibson, 1966). In the context of media and femicide, perception theory helps explain how different audiences may interpret the same media content in varied ways based on their pre-existing beliefs, values, and cultural contexts.

Applying perception theory to the study of audience awareness and perception of femicide reporting (at Trinity University), it was seen that media representations of femicide can significantly influence public perceptions. For instance, if media reports focus on victim-blaming narratives or sensationalist details, audiences may perceive femicide as isolated incidents or justified acts rather than systemic issues of gender-based violence. Conversely, when media coverage emphasises the structural and societal factors contributing to femicide, such as gender inequality and cultural norms, it can foster a deeper understanding and more empathetic responses from the public (Bas et al., 2022). By recognising the role of perception in shaping attitudes and behaviours, this study highlights the importance of responsible media reporting in addressing and combating femicide in Nigeria.

Empirical Review

Lorena Fuentes, Co-Founder and Principal of Ladysmith, brief on Femicide and the Media: Do Reporting Practices Normalise Gender-Based Violence? stated that news media extends beyond mere event narration; it actively communicates and influences social values and interpretations. For instance, when reporting on femicide, the media can both mirror and mould societal perceptions of the violence involved.

Efforts aimed at transforming reporting practices serve as vital tools for fostering broader societal transformation. Therefore, transitioning towards an approach that is sensitive to gender and rights in reporting femicide does not necessitate starting from scratch: existing frameworks can be utilised and adapted to suit specific contexts and address the concerns raised by local anti-violence movements and organisations. Indeed, governments have established pathways for collaboration with women's civil society groups to advocate for unbiased media coverage of femicide. This includes implementing codes of ethics or regulatory guidelines that are in line with international human rights standards and regional agreements.

According to Gillespie et al. (2013), Framing Deadly Domestic Violence: Why the Media's Spin Matters in Newspaper Coverage of Femicide, having utilised frame analysis methodology, the study conducted a comparative examination between newspaper articles on 113 instances of femicide categorised explicitly as domestic violence and a randomly selected control sample of 113 cases lacking such categorisation. The investigation reveals a multifaceted representation within both sets of articles, encompassing various frames. Intriguingly, an emergent frame is identified, previously unrecognised, which situates the femicides within the broader context of domestic violence as a societal issue.

One of the most significant contributions of the study was the identification of an emergent frame that situates femicides within the broader societal issue of domestic violence. This frame goes beyond individual case details to contextualise femicide as a systemic problem rooted in gender inequality, power dynamics, and societal norms. Recognising femicide as part of a larger pattern of domestic violence, media coverage can foster a deeper understanding of the structural factors contributing to these crimes, thereby challenging simplistic narratives that might otherwise perpetuate victim-blaming or minimise the severity of gender-based violence.

Moreover, the study highlights the importance of how the media's framing choices can influence public discourse and policy responses. Articles that adopt a domestic violence frame are more likely to prompt discussions about prevention strategies, support services for victims, and legal reforms aimed at protecting women from violence within intimate relationships. This framing not only acknowledges the broader implications of femicide but also encourages societal accountability and collective action to address underlying causes and promote gender equality.

Also, Omorogiwa, Tracy B. E. (2017), in the Public Perception of the Impacts of Domestic Violence Against Women; after the data for the survey was analysed, it became clear how the general population in Benin City evaluated the frequency of violence against women and the different effects of this problem. These consequences include problems with psychological and physical health, as well as separation and divorce. This result corroborates the findings of Gracia, Garcia, and Lila (2009), who found that the public's perspective and perception of domestic violence against women in Nigeria are generally positive. The results corroborate WHO's (2013) assertion that negative practices directed towards women perpetuate violence against women across different countries.

After analysing the survey data, it became evident that the general population in Benin City perceives violence against women as a significant and pervasive issue with far-reaching consequences. The findings highlight that violence against women not only affects their psychological and physical health but also contributes to societal issues such as separation and divorce. This aligns with broader research, such as that of Gracia, Garcia, and Lila (2009), which underscores how societal perceptions can influence the prevalence and acceptance of domestic violence against women in Nigeria. Furthermore, the results from Benin City support the World Health Organization's (WHO) assertion that harmful practices and attitudes towards women perpetuate violence across different cultural contexts and countries (WHO, 2013). This underscores the need for comprehensive strategies that address both the cultural norms and structural inequalities that sustain gender-based violence.

Research Methodology

A quantitative research design (questionnaire) was used for the study. This decision was made based on the need to comprehensively assess and describe the understanding of research participants regarding media reporting of femicide. The population of this study is made up of the undergraduate students of Trinity University, Yaba, Lagos, from 100-500 level; estimated at 1046 undergraduate students in the institution. According to Taro Yamane's formula, the determined sample size is 290.

Since it typically rounds up to the nearest whole number when dealing with sample sizes, the recommended sample size using the Taro Yamane formula would be 290. Therefore, according to the Taro Yamane formula, you should take a sample size of 290 from a population of 1046 to achieve a 95% confidence level with a margin of error of 5%. Although the sample for this study is 290, the researcher was only able to gather 200 responses to the questionnaire.

Purposive sampling technique was used for this study. The justification for selecting this sampling method is to give the best chance of creating a representative sample out of the population in order to derive the most accurate results due to the nature of the research. Data are collected using a structured questionnaire. The questionnaire was carefully designed to investigate media coverage, audience perception, and responses to femicide in Nigeria. The questionnaire was distributed to the respondents through student WhatsApp platforms.

Data Presentation and Analysis

The level of awareness of femicide among undergraduate students

Chart 1

The pie chart, with a total of 200 responses, indicates that people often have access to media outlets which tell the event, there is a record of 70% which says people have come across news which tells about femicide.

How undergraduate students perceive femicide cases in Nigeria

The perception of femicide coverage tends to reflect the ideology which people have on the issue. In this particular case, there is high involvement of feminism, which argues that there are advances in gender equity; therefore, it should decrease the risk of femicide as men lose the ability to control women.

This pie chart, with a total of 200 responses with high response on the ambiguous part with a total of 57.9% shows that there is no platform which the media uses in creating awareness on the issue of femicide in Nigeria.

Impact of Media Coverage on Awareness and Perception

The media plays an important role in shaping people's perceptions and behaviours by broadcasting information, creating awareness, and offering education. It encourages communication among individuals and allows them to get insights on numerous global, social, and environmental issues.

With a total number of 190 responses, 57.9% agreed that there is a high chance of media coverage affecting the public, letting the public know of the cases of femicide in Nigeria.

Results from Findings

- i. Media consumption habits: The majority of interviewees cited social media (63%), television (49%), and newspapers (28%) as their primary sources of information. Only 10% of the participants reported utilising online news sources.
- ii. Awareness of femicide cases: Approximately 67% of participants reported being aware of femicide instances in Nigeria. However, awareness varied according to the media source, with social media users being more aware of femicide cases than television and newspaper viewers.
- iii. Perceptions of femicide reporting: Participants expressed varying opinions about femicide reporting in Nigeria. While some participants thought the media effectively covered femicide cases (42%), others thought it sensationalised the situations (31%), or ignored them entirely (27%).

Discussion of Findings

Nigerian audiences may internalise unfavourable images of femicide in the media, resulting in desensitisation to violence against women and a lack of empathy for victims. This can foster a culture of impunity for femicide perpetrators while impeding efforts to address the core causes of gender-based violence. The outcomes of this study indicate that media coverage of femicide in Nigeria varies and may influence audience perceptions and responses to these instances. The media frequently sensationalises stories of femicide, emphasising gory details and blaming victims for their own deaths. This sensationalism can lead to victim-blaming and reinforce damaging preconceptions about women, influencing public perceptions of femicide in Nigeria. Social media tends to play an important role in raising awareness about femicide instances, although traditional media sources such as television and newspapers may fall behind. Participants' reactions to femicide occurrences show a significant desire for action by both the government and individuals to address the issue. Social media platforms have proven an effective tool for raising awareness about femicide in Nigeria and making criminals accountable. However, social media can be used to disseminate negative femicide narratives and prolong victim blame. Therefore, this study agrees with Lorena Fuentes (2020) that news media extends beyond mere event narration; it actively communicates and influences social values and interpretations.

Another finding is the media's responsibility to cover femicide. The media has a responsibility to report on femicide in a way that is sympathetic to the victims' experiences while avoiding perpetuating damaging stereotypes. The media may assist in educating the public and increase awareness about femicide by covering incidents factually and impartially. In addition to the aforementioned findings, the audience's reactions to femicide. Nigerian audiences may react to incidents of femicide with outrage, despair, and a desire for justice. However, the media's representation of femicide can impact audience reactions, resulting in victim blaming and a lack of empathy for the victims. This study, however, agreed with the findings of Gracia, Garcia, and Lila (2009), who found that the public's perspective and perception of domestic violence against women in Nigeria are generally positive.

Another finding from this conversation is media activism for gender equality. Nigerian media sources can play an important role in promoting gender equality and addressing damaging perceptions about women. The media can influence audience perspectives and build a culture of respect and equality by presenting good depictions of women and emphasising the social impact of femicide.

Another finding is that engaging audiences in debates concerning femicide promotes discussion. Public awareness campaigns, talks, and educational programs can be used by media companies to engage audiences in conversations concerning femicide. By creating safe spaces for dialogue and promoting empathy and understanding, the media may inspire audiences to take action against femicide in Nigeria. This study corroborates Gillespie et al. (2013) recognizing femicide is part of a larger pattern of domestic violence; media coverage can foster a deeper understanding of the structural factors contributing to these crimes, thereby challenging simplistic narratives that might otherwise perpetuate victim-blaming or minimise the severity of gender-based violence.

The significance of intersectionality in media coverage. The media must acknowledge the intersectionality of femicide in Nigeria, taking into account elements including race, class, and religion. The media may foster a more nuanced view of femicide by providing comprehensive and intersectional coverage of incidents, as well as help address the core causes of gender-based violence.

Conclusion and Recommendations

In conclusion, the way that femicide in Nigeria is covered by the media greatly influences how the public views and reacts to this problem. The way these cases are portrayed in the media has the power to shape public perceptions, attitudes, and behaviour regarding the prevention of femicide. The public may become less sensitive to these murders as a result of the media's many inadequacies in reporting on femicide, which include underreporting or sensationalising incidents. Furthermore, cultural norms, societal views, and gender dynamics that can support victim-blaming and encourage violence against women frequently influence how the public perceives femicide in Nigeria. This may make it more difficult to advocate for legislative reforms, provide victim care, and launch preventative initiatives in response to femicide. More responsible and impartial media coverage of femicide in Nigeria is required to address these problems, emphasising the structural nature of gender-based violence and the necessity of societal transformation. To stop femicide and give women in Nigeria a safer environment, efforts should also be taken to combat damaging gender stereotypes and advance gender equality.

Therefore, to raise awareness and spur action against gender-based violence, audience perception and reactions to femicide in Nigeria are crucial. Here are some suggestions for enhancing these components:

- i. Expanded media coverage: Nigerian media outlets ought to provide special attention to covering femicide incidents and bringing attention to the pervasiveness of gender-based violence. This may contribute to illuminating the matter and raising public awareness of the seriousness of the issue. In order to prevent sensationalism when covering such events, journalists should also receive sensitive reporting training.
- ii. Provide accurate and balanced information: Information that is factual and impartial must be provided by the media on femicide instances, including information on the causes, effects, and possible solutions. The core causes of gender-based violence, such as misogyny, patriarchy, and a lack of gender equality, should be given special attention. Providing a fair-minded viewpoint can aid in debunking femicide myths and stereotypes.
- iii. Interact with a variety of audiences: To guarantee a wide range of viewpoints on femicide, media outlets should reach out to a variety of audiences, including women, men, youth, and marginalised groups. Interacting with various communities can support the development of a coordinated response to gender-based violence as well as a conversation on the prevention and treatment of femicide.
